The Bravest Battle.

The bravest battle that ever was fought! Shall I tell you where and when? On the maps of the world you will find it not; 'Twas fought by the mothers of men.

Nay, not with cannon, or battle-shot, With sword, or nobler pen; Nay, not with eloquent word or thought, From mouths of wonderful men.

But deep in a walled-up woman's heart— Of woman that would not yield, But bravely, silently bore her part— Lo! there is that battle-field!

No marshaling troop, no bivouac song; No banner to gleam and wave! But, oh! these battles they last so long— From babyhood to the grave!

LITERARY NOTES.

SIX LITERARY WOMEN.

Miss Sarah Anne Jewett, whose written works have attracted so much attention of late for their natural beauty, is a bright and handsome young woman of 36 years, who in features is represented as bearing somewhat of a likeness to the Princess of Wales. She resides with her mother in a pretty homestead at South Berwick, Me., her birthplace, and among whose woods and hills she acquired, as a child, that love for nature which she so charmingly manifests in her writings. As a child she was dreamy and imaginative, and owing to her delicate health was allowed to enjoy, to her heart's content, the outdoor life her nature craved. The woods and hills of Berwick, says a friend, were her playground, and the birds and flowers her companions. Miss Jewett is passionately fond of outdoor sports, and rarely a summer afternoon passes that she does not enjoy exercise with the oar. In other times of the year she can be found in the saddle of a favorite young horse, galloping through the country, her face flushed with health and excitement. In person Miss Jewett is tall and dignified, with a high-bred grace and courtesy of manner which she extends to friend and stranger alike. Her conversation is bright and interesting, and a fund of rare and charming wit never fails her. She manifests the deepest interest in her literary work, composing and writing quickly, in a bold, neat chirography. All her works have met with flattering success among a wide constituency, for whom she writes all too little.

For children, especially, the name of "Hope Ledyard" has a peculiar fascination. The pseudonym represents a bright, clever woman known in private life as Mrs. F. McCready Harris, who resides in comfortable circumstances in Degraw St., Brooklyn. Mrs. Harris has written moderately of late, chiefly owing to the cares and anxieties attendant upon the careful education of a large family of boys, to whom she is a devoted and loving mother. Only a short time ago Mrs. Harris was as well known as a lecturer as a writer, but for nearly two years she has not appeared in that capacity. The clever, little woman whose writings have been so much relished by her young readers is precisely as her books portray her—bright, cheerful and full of genial warmth and cordiality that wins for her a constantly increasing circle of friends. She is both religious and charitable, and has a sympathetic nature that is immediately responsive to any suffering or distress of her fellow beings. Her family of boys is scarcely less interesting than herself; all are studious, lovers of literature, and bear unmistakable evidences of the mother's careful training.

The statement recently made by a literary periodical, in answer to an inquiry from one of its subscribers, to the effect that Mary Howitt had died some years since, was an evidence of how almost entirely forgotten is this gifted literary woman. Although nearly 83 years of age, Mrs. Howitt still possesses excellent health, residing in a beautiful old manse at Meran, Austria, which she has named "Marion's Rest." Her surroundings are of the most pleasant character, her garden surrounding the house being the favorite spot of the venerable authoress. "My health is as good to-day, if not better, than twenty years ago," writes Mrs. Howitt, under date of Dec. 14, "and my mental faculties unimpaired." She is at present actively engaged in literary work for the English periodical Good Words, by which she is under agreement to write several papers during the present year in continuation of her "Reminiscences of My Life." She finds no difficulty in writing or composing. My thoughts run freely, although, of course, I cannot accomplish so large an amount of work as formerly.

Miss Louisa May Alcott has decided to pass the winter and spring in Boston, in the company of her father. Miss Alcott's methods of work are exceedingly peculiar, and she is said to have the wonderful power of carrying over a dozen plots in her head at a time, thinking them over when she is in the mood. In this way she will sometimes carry a plot for years, and will suddenly find it already to be written. Often in the dead waste and middle night, it is related in this connection, she lies awake and plans whole chapters, word for word, and when daylight comes has only to write them as if she were copying. In her hardest working days she used to write fourteen hours in the twenty-four, sitting steadily at her work and scarcely tasting food till her daily task was done. When engaged in the work of composition, her characters seem more real to her than actual people. They will not obey her; she merely writes of them what she seems to see and hear, and sometimes those shadows whom she has conjured almost affright her with their wilful reality, and makes but few corrections or interlineations. "I know exactly what I want to say," she explains, "and there is no occasion for correcting or writing over. Once I put a paragraph or a sentence down, there it is and there it remains until put in type." It is said that very frequently Miss Alcott never reads over what she has written.

Mrs. Frances Hodgson Burnett, entirely recovered from her recent illness, has resumed her literary work at her luxurious Washington home. She is a lady of tolerably petite stature, a pleasing and rather handsome face, with features large and expressive. Her hair is of a reddish tinge, not unlike that of Ella Wheeler, the poet. She is a most vivacious and entertaining conversationalist, and finds no difficulty in interesting as well as charming the gatherings of friends who regularly assemble at her home. Mrs. Burnett has a decided tendency for dress, and her wardrobe is as costly as it is strikingly indicative of good taste. Her husband, Dr. Swan M. Burnett, who is a physician of large practice in Washington, is devotedly attached to his gifted wife, and it is through him that all her literary engagements are made. Her correspondence with her publishers and the magazines for which she writes is invariably conducted through her husband. Mrs. Burnett's domestic relations are of the happiest nature, and in her husband she finds more the lover, so attentive is he to her slightest wish. She is a general favorite in the social circles in which she moves, and is always the center of an admiring throng of friends wherever she appears.

In a neatly furnished and comfortable home on Penn street, in Brooklyn, resides Mrs. Margaret E. Sangster, whose poems are, perhaps, more widely quoted at the present day than those of any of her contemporaries. Mrs. Sangster is a tireless literary laborer. She is a regular contributor to more than a dozen literary periodicals throughout the country, and, besides accomplishing the work which incessant demands from these publications thrusts to her, she does a large amount of reading for the Harpers, for whom she also writes, and is, aside from all this, one of the editors of the Christian Intelligencer, in which her weekly thoughts in "Aunt Marjorie's Corner" are more eagerly read than, perhaps, any other portion of the paper. Mrs. Sangster is of medium stature, and upon her shoulders rests a pleasant face that, from the smile which invariably plays upon it, never seems to have known much of the world's sorrow. Refined and gentle of manners, she delights all who are thrown into contact with her. Mrs. Sangster is a widow, her husband having mysteriously disappeared some years ago. She has, however, never given him up as dead, although years have passed without bringing any tidings of his whereabouts. Her home life is one of New England simplicity, yet so attractive as to leave no doubt upon the mind of even the casual visitor of the supreme happiness which finds a permanent rest within it.

OF

L. S. PLAUT & CO.

NEWARK, N. J.

Announcement Extraordinary

The attention of the public of New Jersey is respectfully called to the great

which was inaugurated on Tuesday morning, July 13th, with the greatest slaughter of prices ever heard of in this State.

$250,000.00

over a quarter of a million dollars' worth of Fancy Goods, Fancy Dry Goods, Men's Furnishings, Ladies', Children's, Boys' & Youths' Shoes, etc., offered during this great sale

At a Great Sacrifice.

The Bee Hive is to be remodelled and greatly enlarged, as these improvements are absolutely necessary by its enormously increased business. Its present large capacity having been completely out-grown, and now for the third time in its existence it is to be more than doubled in size.

It is plain to all that to make these great changes we must reduce our immense stock of goods to the smallest possible proportions. This can only be done in one way, and to accomplish this reduction, prices have been placed averaging fully 25 per cent reduction and in many cases to one-half former value. When you consider for a moment that these reductions are made upon new merchandise of this seasons purchase, and not upon old stock, you can then realize that grand bargains are likely to be found during this great alteration sale.

Remember that this is our extremity and your opportunity, and no such bona fide sacrifice has ever been made in Newark before, and not likely to be done again in many years. People from a distance will save more than enough to compensate them for expenses and trouble by visiting this great sale. The most careful attention will be paid to filling orders by mail, and customers can rest assured they will get just what they order and just what is advertised.

This Great Sale is now in Progress.
